How to Avoid Becoming Tran

When Chinese government is putting much efforts on building her own media industry and the soft power, an important but yet to be noticed question is, how to avoid becoming the transmitter for other countries' soft power. A M.A. thesis concludes the major principle of the international news reporting of American mainstream media as "taking our side as the dominant factor". The author of this article believes that the international news reporting of Chinese media not only doesn't have that awareness, but also follows the agenda-setting of foreign media blindly, transferring the others' information, copying the others' discourse, and finally becoming the mouthpiece of the others' soft power. The author also points out three weaknesses of Chinese international news reporting: basically relying on foreign media, positive reports mainly, and lacking the awareness of the soft advertisement news.

Introduction: Sixteen and a Half Questions on "Being Critical"

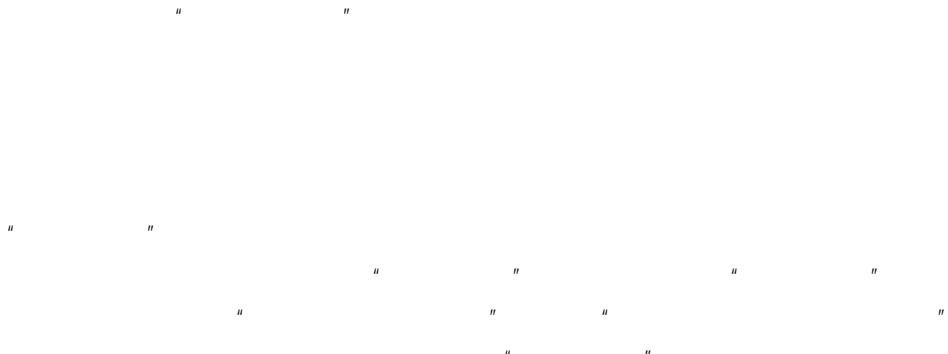

The author believes that being critical is banal and easy. By raising a few simple questions and going back to our experiences, the author approaches his point. Since many agree that modern consciousness is fundamentally critical consciousness, the author regards ourselves as self-consciously cynical-cynical of the ideologies. However the self-doubling cynical consciousness might exactly be what ideology produces. Therefore, the author asks if our critical analyses themselves are part of what these analyses purport to criticize. By discussing these questions, the author hopes us to think more about "being critical".

Censorship or Grading? The Predicament of Administration and Transition of Chinese Films

The censorship towards the films as the center of Chinese film administration, has been a quite controversial public topic that attracts great attention. The public opinion suggests that the censorship of the film contents should be loosen and the film grading should be carried out instead. The author reviewed the history, current situation and features of Chinese film censorship system, and believes the system is overall an ideological management implemented by administrative methors, which leads to the current predicament. The author believes it's no easy for the film censorship system in China to transform into film grading system, and the Western model of film administration is not a perfect shortcut to follow. Since the Chinese films are heading along a benign pathway, the authors believes things will become better gradually.

U.S. Government Support and the Global Expansion of Hollywood

The article reviews the historical facts that how U.S. Government supports the global expansion of Hollywood and analyses the reasons behind. Ever since 1910, U.S. Government relying on the law system that treats the domestic and the overseas differently, and depending on its enormous political and economic power, supports the global expansion of Hollywood by diplomatic methods, tax leverage, funding and facility service. According to the historical facts, the successful globalization of Hollywood and its leading position in global film industry, is not only because of the power of its industry and the charm of its products, but also because of the role played by U.S. Government. On the other hand, U.S. Government's support to Hollywood, bases on Hollywood's significant economic, cultural and political values.

Global Mind, Chinese Heart: the Culture Identity of Chinese College Students at Internet Age

Has the Internet at some extent changed the Chinese students' identity with the traditional Chinese culture? The research conducted by the author demonstrates that college students and graduate students generally rely on Internet to acquire news and information about the outer world. Most female students are fascinated with Korean

TV dramas, and male students with American TV dramas, while many of them realize that Korean and Japanese dramas have a distance with the reality and they will abide by the Chinese value and the norms instilled by the family, school and media when facing personal decisions. Many of them often use new media such as mobile phone and traditional media such as books and magazines to verify opinions and information acquired from the Internet. Local culture is like an evergreen tree rooted deep inside their hearts, and the education they have received for the last 20 years is not easy to be shaken. In brief, Chinese college students has "global mind and Chinese heart".

Cultural Foundations of Western Representation of China

It is well documented that negative images have dominated Western reporting of China in recent decades. However, there is insufficient study on structural features of how media images of China are generated in the mass media. This article aims to explore cultural foundations of Western image of China, focusing on a modernity discourse that provides the cultural repertoire for China reporting. In particular, it seeks to understand cultural as well as political functions of Western reporting of China from the perspective of power relations between China and the West.

discourse of modernity. While the Western media have predominantly applied the liberal h their broad patterns of reporting follow largely Western material (political/strategic and economic/military) interests in the tradition of realpolitik industrialist version of modernity. This internal split of modernity discourse – liberal humanism as applied in domestic politics and realpolitik industrialism in international politics – constitutes the fundamental flaw in Western coverage of China.

The article falls into four parts. Part one examines the intrinsic relationship between modernity discourse and media practice, focusing on different configurations of liberal humanism and industrialism as the grand narrative in representing China. Part Two traces the historical trajectory of Western images and reporting of China, highlighting different mix of the two versions of modernity in line with Western interests at crucial historical junctures. Part three discusses narrative approaches to decoding Western media reporting. Part four presents a preliminary model of analyzing media portrayals of China.

Toward a Labor Theory of Journalism

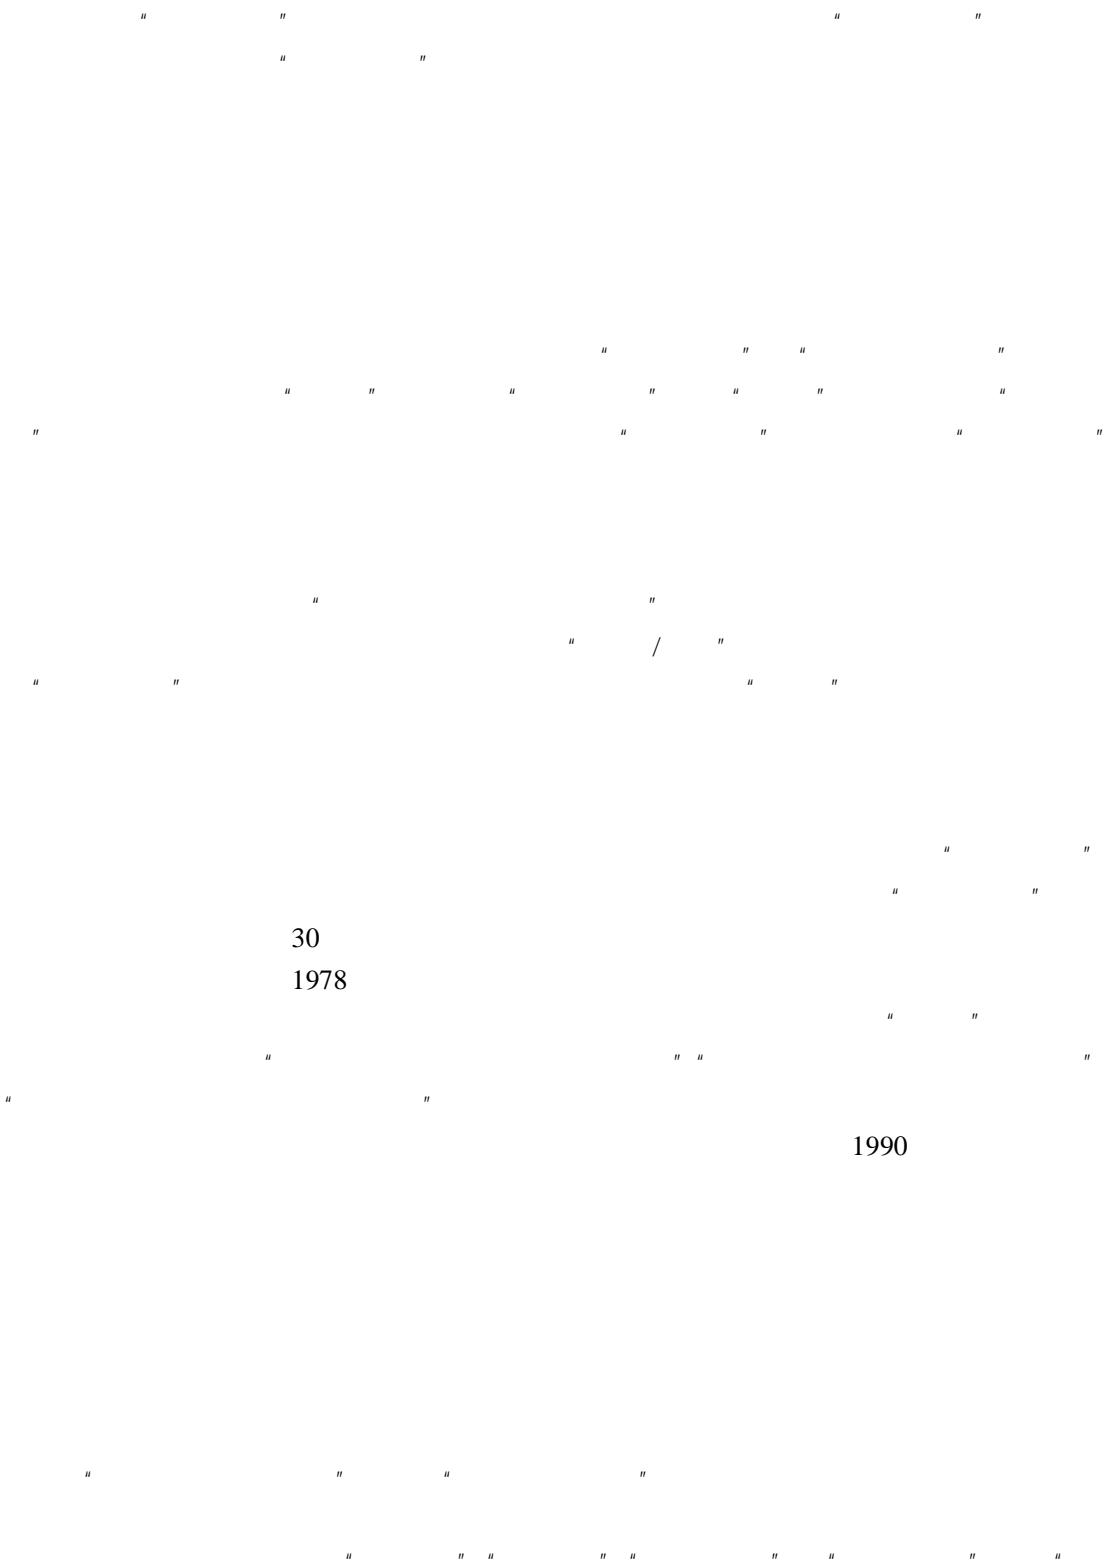

Labor Process and Labor Control in Chinese Media Industry

Most of the studies on Chinese journalists tend to start from a premise that journalism is an independent profession, which has its own rules and should be isolated from any authoritative power, especially the Chinese state. This liberal framework effectively confined the academic resources work. Therefore, a lot of more fundamental questions about the labor relations and labor process of news production always left untouched. This article will focus on this underlying area as how news production is organized and controlled in Chinese media industry, What are the labor process

Covering of Technology in the Formation of Network Opinions

This paper discusses the bias of network technology in the formation of network opinions, which is a topic belonging to the category of "possibility". For this reason, the author reinterprets Heidegger's concept of "idle talk", and constructs a analytical framework—"idle talk-authentic opinion". This paper holds that network technology covers the free market of opinions by idle talks and disturbs the market by prejudices, because the "digger" of the market is removed by network technology. Therefore, opinions can not see each other and network opinions can not be formed because of the covering of technology, and it also turns out to be blatant both in and out of the free market of opinions.
